Technical Research Report

by Katie Bessiere, Irina Ceaparu, Jonathan Lazar, John Robinson, Ben Shneiderman

TR 2005-34
Social and Psychological Influences on Computer User Frustration (Newhagen book chapter)
Katie Bessiere¹, Irina Ceaparu², Jonathan Lazar³, John Robinson¹ and Ben Shneiderman²

¹Department of Sociology
University of Maryland, College Park, Maryland 20742

²Department of Computer Science, Human-Computer Interaction Laboratory, Institute for Advanced Computer Studies & Institute for Systems Research
University of Maryland, College Park, Maryland 20742

³Department of Computer and Information Sciences &
Center for Applied Information Technology
Towson University, Towson, Maryland, 21252

(kbessiere@socy.umd.edu, irina@cs.umd.edu, jlazar@towson.edu, robinson@socy.umd.edu, ben@cs.umd.edu)

Draft: September 6, 2002

Abstract
As computer usage has proliferated, so has user frustration. Even devoted and knowledgeable users encounter annoying delays, incomprehensible messages, incompatible files, and indecipherable menus. The frustration generated by these problems can be personally disturbing and socially disruptive. Psychological and social perspectives on frustration may clarify the relationships among variables such as personality types, cultural factors, goal attainment, workplace anger, and computer anxiety. These perspectives may also help designers, managers, and users understand the range of responses to frustration, which could lead to effective interventions such as redesign of software, improved training, better online help, user discipline, and even resetting of national research priorities.