UpFront YOU ARE HERE: Life In Baltimore, Observed By Ben Cassie

OCTOBER 14, 2017
FOUND ART
East 31st Street

"There's no such thing as a bad home movie." —John Waters.

The home movies screened at Normal's Books & Records tonight include the expected clips of a 1950s-era Ocean City vacation and an Irish-Catholic wedding reception of the same vintage. There's footage of a crammed 1983 East Baltimore rowhouse Christmas, a swinging sermon from a local black church, and shots of a sister and brother playing in their Rodgers Forge backyard, which begins in rather pedestrian fashion until the boy dons a Fidel Castro-inspired beard and Cuban military-style cap, picks up a toy rifle and chases after his sister.

Some of the footage screened is from professionally archived sources, others are found on eBay and the like, and some are courtesy of audience members who have brought along their own home movies.

"Hey, it was 1950," the grown-up would-be revolutionary explains from the back of the crowd amid raucous laughter. "Castro was a hero in the U.S."

Hosted locally by the Mid-Atlantic Regional Moving Image Archive (MARMA), Home Movie Day is an annual event that's been held around the world since 2002. Among other efforts, the preservation nonprofit recently began digitizing historic footage from WZZ-TV.

Also on hand is Jaume Castro (no relation to Fidel, needless to say), media conservation and digitalization specialist with the National Museum of African American History & Culture, who is screening home movies shot by black families in Washington, D.C. and Baltimore. Those films, mostly from the 1960s and 1970s, capture everyday African-American family life—at home, at their local schools, at wedding receptions—that simply was not represented on television or by Hollywood at the time.

"Home movies hold all kinds of finds and provide context that documents life in the region the way it was lived by everyday people," says MARMA president Sieghan Hagan, before a lively crab feast-day camping adventure on the Chesapeake Bay from the early 1960s appears on screen.

We are still here
We are not going away
We have poor wares
We have parts of our culture
It is still here
We still make our jewelry
We still make our leather
